Commentary: During the past two weeks, silver has slightly surpassed the value of $18 per ounce ($18.02 = €12.14 today), with gold briefly reaching $952 per ounce, currently (Sunday the 24th February) at $944.75 = €636.72). These skyscraping figures have caused us to re-evaluate the pricing of precious metal coins.

However, we must first attempt to determine whether this is yet another "bubble", like the Hunt brothers' manipulation of gold and silver in 1979/1980, Morgan dollars in 1989/1990, home prices in the US in 2005/2006. Will precious metals indeed eventually finalize in the current range, or will be see a collapse back to the standard prices of two or three years ago, both about half the current level. Obviously, there is no fortune-teller who can accurately predict the prices of precious metals, but we can examine the economic, political and environmental aspects associated with these prices.

By own brief opinions here are that the rapidly rising wealth in India and China has undoubtedly boosted the demand for gold and silver within those huge nations. Similarly, the demise in the stock, bond and real estate markets in Europe and America has encouraged investors to choose precious metals. These two influences are nonetheless very different, the first likely to survive forever, the second likely to disappear once the current proto-recession is surmounted. It is of course unpredictable which of these two factors will emerge as more influential once the Western economies rebound. My gut feeling is that economic growth in the emerging countries, including India and China, will far outweigh the post-recession demand reduction in the West.

While it is indisputable that environmental considerations have and will continue to increase the cost of mining, but today's prices should easily enable miners to overcome these higher costs. Moreover, should higher metal prices seem secure in the long term, the risk of mining expansion will largely disappear. More mining can vastly increase availability, thus imposing pressure against rising prices.

How will reasonably steady $20 silver and $1000 gold affect numismatic prices? The answer seems to be "up", and if that is the case, then dealers, collectors and investors must reexamine their prices and accept the resultant price changes. The coin market will require some time to readjust, perhaps 12-18 months and that is if the metals markets stabilize.

This year (1-3 February) I attended the Berlin Money Fair, which I believe is now the largest coin fair in Europe. Unlike our fairs in the US, the main room of the Berlin fair was occupied principally by government mints and their equipment providers, whereas traditional coin dealers and auction houses were spread mainly in smaller adjacent rooms and corridors. Many of these dealers specialized in very modern coins, Euros as well as recent gold and silver commemoratives, and most of the remainder displaying predominantly German coins, understandable in Berlin. There were perhaps ten dealers with significant numbers of ancient coins, and only one with a large selection of Asian coins, mostly pre-Islamic. Nobody carried a large selection of Islamic or Indian coins. As a result, the fair accounted for a tiny percentage of what I acquired in Germany for our inventory. Will we continue to attend this fair? Probably, and perhaps Joe may go as well.

The following weekend, on Saturday the 9th, I attended the one-day Holiday Inn fair in London, which has been run by Howard Simmons for many, many years. Although there was more interesting material for my own interests, the fair is extraordinarily brief, opening to the public at 9:30AM and closing at 5PM, though by 3PM, most of the dealers had already packed up and departed. Unfortunately, a "fatality" on the Hereford line of Great Western cancelled my train from Charlbury, and the replacement bus to the Oxford station further delayed me. Thus I arrived two hours later than planned, but did manage to make some interesting purchases there, my best success at the Holiday Inn fair in many years. As for the Friday before and the following Sunday, I was able to relax in Charlbury, a delightful small town in Oxfordshire.

Our website will soon mature!! We are currently negotiating for a major reorganization of what is admittedly a very primitive site. We anticipate that we will have our entire inventory (currently more than 18,000 pieces) efficiently searchable, together with a shopping cart that will allow you to confirm and complete an order without ever needing to resort to the telephone or email. Moreover, we still hope to replace the non-photo printed price lists with a monthly online list, for which we will email everyone a few days in advance with the exact time the online list will be made available. We are still proposing to make a printed list available to that declining number of customers who lack access to the internet.

This will be an admittedly change how we maintain our business, but this is now the 21st century and we have to keep up with the times. We will appreciate as always your suggests and commentaries regarding the new website when it is finally up and running, hopefully in the next few weeks.
