So I must request that when speaking with us or when leaving a message on the answering line, please speak carefully and clearly. Above, all, please state your name slowly, and include your telephone number right after mentioning your name. This will save time when we need to repeat the saved messages.

TEXAS

From 6 to 24 March I (Steve) enjoyed a remarkable holiday in a locations normally frowned upon by Californians, the State of Texas. I flew into Dallas-Fort Worth on the 5th, rented a car, then drove straight out into ghastly rushhour traffic, reaching my hotel in Stephenville about 10PM, having stopped for dinner in Cleburne, fearful that there would no longer be an open restaurant in Stephenville, except junkfood.

Stephenville is home of Tarleton University, news to me. But being a student town, Starbucks was open until midnight (11PM weekends), whereas here in Santa Rosa, most coffee houses close at 6PM or 7PM, which one Starbucks as late as 8:30. I spent three days in and around Stephenville, one to visit the city museum (in freezing weather with a inch of now, only do learn that most of the displays are outdoors), one to go hiking at Proctor Lake and visit a few local sights, and one to drive further around, with several short walks in small towns, e.g., Dublin, Comanche, etc..

From Stephenville, I spent two more days leasurly driving to Kerrville, where I stayed for three nights. En route I visited the magnificent city of Oxford TX. Well, not exactly magnificent, for "downtown" consists of one dilapidated and long abandoned building that must have been a combination grocery and gas station, 2 or 3 ostensibly inhabited homes, one apparently inhabited trailer surrounded by piles of rusting farmgear and trash, the lonely brick chimney of what must once have been a splendid home, burned to the ground decades ago, and the graveyard, featuring at least 100 stones.

Texas is filled with fully or largely abandoned villages, some still with several dozen homes (many of them trailers), a store or two, perhaps a saloon, sometimes a dingy post office, as well as few inevitable agricultural businesses. Some have humerous names, such as Ding Dong just south of Killeen, Mahomet near Brunet (pop. 97), with a Southern Baptist church rather than a mosque, Leakey, with its general store appropriately name Leakey Merchandise (more a tourist trap than a genuine grocery), Utopia, North Manhattan (now just a railway station) and Fairy.

The State of Texas is actually two separate states joined together. One is the Urban state, seven cities and their sprawling suburbia, Dallas-Fort Worth (two cities blended together as one), Houston, San Antonio, Austin, El Paso, McAllen and Waco. The urban region comprises some 8% to 10% of the state but hosts about 75% of the population. The second state fills at least 90% of the land, but with little more than 25% of the inhabitants. Texans appropriately refer this region are as the Back Country, and indeed, I spent the overwhelming portion of my holiday in this fascinating Back Country. My only exceptions were a Sunday afternoon in downtown Waco and another afternoon in downtown and near-downtown McAllen. And my God, what a difference.

Were it not for a few government office buildings and about three square blocks alongside the Brazos River developed for tourism, downtown Waco would be an architectural graveyard. Walking nearly a mile along Austin Street, once the main shopping district for the city, I observed two delivery men and two homeless. No retail shops, no restaurant, a couple bars and cafes (all closed on Sunday), and silence. Today, virtually all shopping, working, studying has been diverted to the edge of town. And this is also true virtually everywhere in the Back Country, where towns from less than 1,000 to at least 40,000 residents have hollowed centers, save for some government offices, a few bars or restaurants, occasionally tourist shops or art galleries, sometimes the post office. Everything else has fled to the edge of town, even more so if Wal-Mart had arrived in town. (more later)
