TEXAS - part 2

Commentary: Before reaching Kerrville I stopped for a few hours in the old German town of Fredericksburg, where I walked around the town center, now a flourishing locale replete with tourist shops, nearly all of them selling geegaws, clothing, etc., most of them without the slightest relationship to Texas. I would suspect that tourist shops in Murphys CA or Ellicott City MD or Wisconsin Dells WI would all be presenting similar useless tourist stuff. But I did have dinner at the Biergarten, with a large menu of German cuisine. My jaegerschnitzel was tasty but disappointingly bland, especially to those who had traveled as extensively in Germany as I have. I politely mentioned this to the waitress, and she replied rather embarrassedly that of course they could have produced the dish with a more traditional flavor, had I asked for that. Obviously, they had to cook rather insipidly to suit the typical American tourists unfamiliar with the intense and delicious flavors of German cuisine.

From Fredericksburg it was about half an hour's drive to Kerrville, where I stayed for 3 nights. Kerrville, about 70 miles from San Antonio, has become a popular retirement area. No wonder downtown Kerrville is thriving reasonably well, with lots of pedestrians, nearly all in their 60s, 70s or even older. At 65, I fell in with the crowd! There are very few historic sites in and around Kerrville, but the state parks in the region are spectacular, not with the grandiosity of Death Valley or Grand Canyon, but as delightful locations where one can relax, enjoy, and walk.

Perhaps Enchanted Rock was the most enthralling, a gigantic rock rising from the endless prairie, a gigantic pink granite boulder some 425 feet high and 4 miles around, a miniature of Ayers Rock in Australia but said to be the second-largest batholith in the United State. While the main "trail" or "walkway" attracts hundreds of visitors on a weekend day in March, one can always find solitude in the other sections of the rock and surrounding trails.

Some 30 miles southwest of Kerrville is Lost Maples State Natural Area, home of the rare Uvalde bigtooth maple trees. Hiking around the park, I spent several hours enjoying the diverse scenery, before driving south towards the Rio Grande Valley. Along the way there were so many curiosities, so many stops of take pictures, that it was clear I would not make it to the valley that evening. Thus I chose to spend the night in the "free-est" city in the world, namely Freer, an oil town on Hwy.16, in the flatland that characterises the south of Texas.

Despite its population of nearly 3,200, Freer is a classic example of what we Americans might label "nowheresville". Were it not the county seat of Duval County a relatively recent petroleum site, Freer might have rotten away and disappeared from the earth decades ago. After finding a motel and famished from the hike amidst the maples, I settled down for dinner at an apparently nameless restaurant kitty-corner behind the motel. The only sign on the building indicated a real estate agency, not a restaurant. But the food was superb, perhaps the finest Tex-Mex I've ever encountered, and at the price of Denny's. There were at least a dozen pickups parked alongside, for this was indeed where the locals went for the best cuisine in Freer. And almost surreal, there was a working oilwell in the center of the unpaved intersection between the motel and the cafe.

The town itself is remarkably uninteresting. There were a few shops and of course the county offices sprinkled about downtown, but most shopping had slithered to the edge-of-town, east or west on highway US59. The residential areas were utterly uninteresting, few impressive homes, many deteriorating with age, some abandoned.
