59059. SASANIAN KINGDOM: Ardashir III, 628-630, AR dirham (4.14g), WYHC (the Treasury), year 2, G-226, with wings, obverse die damage makes it look as though Ardashir is sticking out his tongue, appealing ef $175

68862. SASANIAN KINGDOM: Ardashir III, 628-630, AR dirham (3.94g), WYHC (the Treasury), year 2, G-226, cleaned, choice ef $150

68848. SASANIAN KINGDOM: Yazdigerd III, 632-651, AR drachm (4.06g), SK (Sijistan), year 8, G-234, nice strike, lovely vf-ef $140
Yazdigerd III was the last of the Sassanian dynasty, though a few of his successors eked out in Central Asia for a few more decades, but never issued coins. Only the mint of Sakastan (Sijistan) is reasonably common.

68849. SASANIAN KINGDOM: Yazdigerd III, 632-651, AR drachm (4.01g), SK (Sijistan), year 20, G-235, last year of Sassanian coinage, choice vf $140
After Yazdigerd III was driven out and assassinated in his 20th year, the Arabs added "bism Allah" in the obverse margin on coins dated the same year, which was then struck for about a decade with frozen year 20.

75301. HEPHTHALITE: Varahran IV style, ca. 5th C, AR drachm (3.49g), G-32-var, bust right, derived from Sasanian Varahran IV, with tamga to right (type unknown to Göbl) / stylized fire altar and 2 assistants, with head in flames, nice strike, vf, RRR
Despite the fact that this piece shows a head in the flames, whereas the previous one (#75300) does not, they are stylistically part of the same series. Varahran ruled 388-399, and there were likely produced at some time 400-450. The previous coin bears an unread Kushano-Greek inscription right of the bust, but this one has only some meaningless squiggles.

The mint of Misr (Egypt), located at Fustat, which is now a section of Cairo, is remarkably rare for all Abbasid silver coinage, whereas Misr is almost always the most common Abbasid mint for gold.

Unlike other contemporary Abbasid mints, dirham dies for Misr are stylistically distinctive. This suggests that unlike most other mints, whose dies were produced at a centralized factory, probably in Madinat al-Salam, Misr produced its own dies locally.

72173. TURKEY: AR medal, AH1270, NP-1096, Nishani Iftihar (Order of Glory) medal 1854, holed as made, f-vf
This medal bears the title in Turkish of "Order of Glory" because it was in fact a medal associated with the highest Ottoman order of its time. In practice, it seems to have been used primarily as a campaign medal for the Danube Campaign early in the Crimean War, and other recognition for which no other medal existed.

$400

The obverse has the tughra of Abdülmejid I above the date 1270 (1854) surrounded by an ornate circle, behind which flags and sprays of laurel project upwards. Above that is a crescent and star, facing left. The inscription reads "Abdülmejid Khan, Son of Mahmud, the Ever Victorious". On the reverse, at the top, is a faceted star of 11 points, with a small 6 pointed star superimposed over that (roughly resembling the Order of Glory). Below that is a banner with the inscription "Nishani Iftihar" - Order of Glory.

$285

This medal commemorates the end of the First Silesian War. After a two-month campaign, Prussian forces occupied Silesia, which belonged to the Bohemian Crown of the Habsburg possessions. In 1741 the Prussians defeated the Austrians in the Battle of Mollwitz near Brieg (now Brzeg in Poland). In the Peace of Breslau 1742 most of Silesia was ceded to Prussia and was organized into the Silesian province.

$400

During the War of the Austrian Succession, Great Britain was the ally of Maria Theresa of Austria, and fought its two greatest maritime rivals, France and Spain. In July 1745, Captains James Talbot and John Morecock, commanding two privateers in the North Atlantic, the Prince Frederick and the Duke, captured two French treasure ships returning from Callao, the port of Lima. Their haul was £800,000 in silver coins and ingots, plus gold and other goods. When they landed at Bristol in October it took 45 wagons to transport the coin and bullion (which weighed over 78 tons) to the Tower Mint. There the silver was used in the production of the so-called 'Lima' coinage. It was requested that the word 'Lima' be used on the coins to celebrate the exploit.

David Vice says in his Coinage of British West Africa, that the pieces made not in proof state were intended to circulate at trading establishments in Sierra Leone. Britain outlawed the slave trade in 1807 and the following year took over this territory from the Sierra Leone Company of London. This interesting and historic piece thereby marks a sea change for the colony. Those over 24 grams are not tokens but medals struck after 1814.
